The Sheboygan Humane Society site features two primary columns for the initial display, followed by rows below. The layout stays the same on three out of the four main pages. It is a picture next to an informational statement about the page. However, one of the main pages is simply the title, accompanied by information and links that expand the information set in two columns, all the way down. There are two primary columns with small margins on either side of the columns. Under the two-column column in one column with many rows with a large amount of white space. There aren't any borders, but there is a divider line above the column and between the columns. These lines separate the logo title from the beginning of the page as well as between the photo and the words. Within the typography, there is a main heading with a line under the word. The layout is very open with plenty of white space. I do not feel there is an overall organization. They are using a fundamental grid that I do not think is very effective in conveying information. Still, it does draw you in using an emotional appeal with the photos of the animals.
